> [From the Louisville Journal, June 28.] A Louisvillian's Experience in Dixie,

We have conversed with a very intelligent and reliable gentleman, who left this city early in February last, and has been in the South ever since. Immediately after his arrival he enlisted in the Confederate army, and deserted it a month ago-made his way through our lines, and returned here on Friday last. His accounts of the condition of at fairs there generally are deplorable in the ex treme, and are indeed worse than any history we have yet seen. He was when in the army, a hospital steward, and, being perfectly free to go and come as he chose, his op portunities for observation have been much greater than they would have been otherwise A perfect reign of terror has taken hold of dren, strike out, and give your horses the the country, and the people flee from imheel, for these might perchance overtake us pending conscription hiding in the hills and rocks, preferring, in most cases, a death by the slow process of starvation than being forced into the Confederate army. The conscript officers hunt them down with greypestilence, for he is own brother to the hounds and cavalry-in some localities dragng them cruelly from their hiding places. and in any case death is the summary punishment for a refusal to accompany their brutal captors. He gives us an illustration where one man fled to the mountains in Ten nessee for protection from the conscript act, horse. There are some tribes even that would taking with him his wife and little children, not consent to allow him to remain a single and, when accidentally found by the aid of night with them. They call such a one set the hounds, he was dragged forth and cruelfeur el ihoudy, "the Jew's yellow." It is a ly shot because he begged to be released, or permitted to come North.

The people, civilians outside of the army, say that they are subjugated, while the sol diers are indifferent, and have no opinion whatever, and do precisely as they are told to do, believing that they have no right to deum, a 'pool of blood.' The rider is sure to think for themselves, or, if they have, are afraid to give expression to their thoughts. The officers are all in favor of a monarchy white spots except a star on the forehead, or despising with all their might and soul any a simple white stripe down the face. > [From the Cincinnati Commercial.] General Grant in Action.

Nearly every General in command of an army has a peculiar habit, which he exhibits only on the battle-field. In civil life, wine frequently developes traits of character ever revealed in a state of sobriety. In military life battle takes the place of wine in this respect. I could name men, who are noted for their observance of the second commandment, in camp, but who exhibit signs remark here, to save others from doing it. at the expense of this paragraph: That while the intoxication of wine renders loco motion difficult the intexication of battle accelerates it in many instances

You cannot read in General Grant's coun tenance how a battle is going. Whether the enemy is driving him, or he is driving the enemy, he wears the same placed features, neither a smile nor a frown. You look in vain for hope, fear or anxiety depicted in his facial expression. But there is one key by which some idea may be formed as to how he feels while the struggle progresses. General is in camp addicted to the "use of the weed" to a moderate extent, but in the battle-field he indulges more than usual. The more desperate the battle, the more extravagent his use of Cubas and Principees. When his men are pushing forward, and the enemy giving way, the blue smoke ascends at regular intervals in small and scarcely perceptible curls. When the ground is be ng contested, his face is lost in Cuban exhal-When there is a prospect that the day will go against him, he ceases to smoke, and commences to punish his innocent exotic by vigorously biting the end of it. When he rides along the lines without a cigar there is no enemy in front except a small body of rebel cavalry and he knows it.

Gen. Sherman is an inveterate smoker on the battle-field, also. When he was wounded at Shiloh, he wrapped his pocket-handkerchief round his hand, lit a cigar and became more earnest than ever.
